If your humidifier is leaking water, we have just the troubleshooting and repair tips you need to get rid of the issue. Usually, for portable models, water might leak if the reservoir tank isn't placed properly. So, before starting your unit, ensure the tank is in its place entirely. On the other hand, for whole-house units, several reasons might lead to water seepage. Before calling a professional, try troubleshooting by following through with some of these tips. Water Pressure You can start by checking the water pressure in your plumbing system. Usually, whole-house humidifiers use the same water source as the rest of your house. You may find a small pipe connecting the main water supply to the humidifier. The high water pressure might cause an overflow of water, forcing the cutoff valves into your humidifier. Generally, the pressure of your pipelines should be less than 125 psi. Unless you're an expert at plumbing, it's best to call for a technician. Drainage Pipe Besides the connection to the main water supply, whole-house humidifiers also have a drainage tube, which allows excess water to flow out. If there is any blockage or if the downhill flow is unsteady, water leakage is possible. Check to see if anything is blockage. When attaching it back onto the unit, ensure there aren't any twists. Evaporator Pad Like portable humidifiers, any obstruction on the filter of a whole house humidifiers produce steam when air is blown through a filter called the evaporator pad. As with portable humidifiers, the evaporator pad can get clogged over time with minerals and other dirt. In most cases, you can simply clean the evaporator pad, and your unit will be as good as new. For a better understanding of the cleaning process, refer to the instruction manual that came with your unit. Read also: Pros and Cons of Whole House Humidifiers Solenoid Valve The word 'solenoid' may sound technical, but trust us, it's nothing too complicated. The solenoid valve refers to the electric valve that manages water flow from the water levels in the reservoir, allowing more inflow when the water level is down. Once the water has filled up to the required level, the valve closes. However, at times, dirt and debris can also accumulate on the valve, preventing it from closing completely. This may eventually lead to water leakage. You can fix this issue by following these steps: Start by cutting off the humidifier's water supply and by unplugging the unit from the power source. Remove the valve from the unit; make sure you understand how it is installed before you remove it. You can use water or air pressure to get rid of the debris from the valve. Once the dirt and debris are gone, you install the valve back into the unit. Conclusion Whether no mist is coming out of your humidifier or leaking water, our tips will help you resolve the issue without any trouble. Remember that a little care and maintenance can add to the efficiency and longevity of your humidifier.
